Chair of Trustees

Role Profile

A message from our Founder & CEO

Bloomsbury Football Foundation is building something rare: a proven model with the momentum and ambition to become the UK's next major national charity, improving young people's health, wellbeing and life chances.

We are now looking for an exceptional Chair of Trustees to help lead that journey.

Bloomsbury is one of the fastest growing youth social mobility charities in the UK, and this is a role for someone with outstanding experience of scaling organisations - bringing strategic clarity, high standards, and the judgement to help a mission-led organisation grow quickly while strengthening quality, culture and impact.

Our approach is simple and powerful: we repurpose football - the nation's game, woven into the fabric of British life - as a low-cost, non-clinical, preventative vehicle for social mobility. In a digital age where too many young people are growing up with reduced real-world connection, football offers a uniquely compelling way to bring young people together in person, build trust, and create belonging. It is also one of the great unifiers in our society - strengthening community cohesion and giving young people a shared language, identity and purpose.

From a standing start just a few years ago, we now support over 6,500 young people every week in some of London's most deprived communities - including 2,300 girls weekly, making us the largest charitable provider improving health and life outcomes for girls through football in the country.

You would be joining a strong, committed Board of Trustees with senior leaders across finance, legal, charity, marketing and technology. As Chair, you would have real scope to shape our next phase of growth and ensure we have the governance and leadership capacity needed for national scale.

If this opportunity resonates, please do get in touch for a confidential conversation to learn more about what the role involves and the impact your leadership could help unlock.

What others are saying

Bloomsbury Football's approach to helping young people to get active and connect in-person with peers through trauma-informed programmes is an exemplar of the long-term, prevention-first, approach needed to support the nation's mental health at scale.

Mental Health Foundation

There can be no more important task for those concerned with the health of the population than to reduce unjust and avoidable health inequalities. I wholeheartedly welcome Bloomsbury Football Foundation's approach of making the health benefits of sport accessible to all.

Professor Sir Michael Marmot,
Director, Institute of Health Equity

The barriers preventing girls from accessing the health and social benefits of physical activity are deeply entrenched and widespread. Bloomsbury Football is a leading light in tackling these barriers and its goal of enabling thousands more girls to get active - to experience the joy, fulfilment and lifelong benefits of sport - is truly inspiring.

Women in Sport

Bloomsbury Football Foundation's approach to supporting young refugees and asylum seekers is hugely refreshing and a clear example of best practice across the sector.

The Refugee Council

One of the most impressive things about Bloomsbury Football is how they've embedded technology and AI into their strategy to improve outcomes for young people and drive an efficiency rarely seen in the charity sector - making them an outstanding philanthropic investment.

Robin Klein, Founder, LocalGlobe

Many children in London are leading sedentary lives, which risks negative physical and mental health outcomes.

This applies disproportionately to the 700,000 children living in poverty in the capital. Bloomsbury Football Foundation is at the forefront of levelling the playing field for these children.
